REPUBLISHING GUIDELINE

We produce the highest quality of African content. We create products and services characterised with originality and focused on attracting African descents and non-Africans looking for an authentic Africa experience. Our news and articles are published and edited by professional editors and our work undergoes rigorous editorial process before publication.

We do not prohibit republication of our contents provided this guideline is strictly adhered to.

- Do not edit our pieces other than making minor changes to adhere to your publication's preferred style guide. It's OK to add serial commas if that's what your newsrooms uses, for example. Ask for permission to make major changes, including translations into other languages. Please address questions and requests to programs@fatherlandglobal.com

- Do not make changes to headlines without asking for permission.

- Note that you're not required to include the text of the sub-head that appears below the headlines of our pieces. (But you're welcome to include it if you wish).

- Some of our longer pieces include graphics with story tips and other sidebar graphics. You're permitted to republish those pieces without including those graphics. It's also OK to republish the graphics to include in your own stories.

- If you republish one of our pieces online, please link back to the original piece and include all hyperlinks from the original piece.

- Please include the author's byline and a prominent attribution line mentioning that the article was originally published on Fatherland Community. If you're republishing this piece on a website, please include a link to the original piece in the attribution line. We prefer the byline to include the name of our publication — e.g. "By John Doe, Fatherland Community."

- Please note that our Creative Commons license does not include the main image that appears at the top of each piece. In the interest of making the republishing process easier for you, most of the images on our website are also published under their own Creative Commons license, but not all of them. That being the case, please do not republish the main image on this piece without asking for permission — unless it's clear from the caption that the image came from a free image database such as Pixabay or Unsplash.

You are free and encouraged to use your own image. For image permissions requests – or any other questions – please reach out to programs@fatherlandglobal.com .
